Course Description:

This course will introduce students to the modern, critical study of the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament), as well as other ancient works, emphasizing in particular the analysis and interpretation of gender and sexuality in the ancient world. Specifically, we will engage in careful and informed readings of a range of biblical texts (narrative, law, wisdom literature), in order to investigate a series of questions regarding the mutual constitution of male and female in the literary traditions of ancient Israel. What happens to the goddess in monotheism? How does biblical narrative imaginatively realize the lives of women and men. What ideal roles are constructed and assigned to each? How are their bodies and sexualities conceptualized and legislated by biblical law? Comparative evidence from classical Greece and the ancient Near East will help bring the specificity of the biblical traditions into clearer focus. Selected secondary readings will introduce students to some of the theoretical issues involved in the study of gender and sexuality, of ancient literature in general, and of biblical literature in particular. No previous coursework on the Bible is required.
