Course Description:

In the nineteenth century, philologists revealed, through painstaking criticism of the biblical text, that the Pentateuch (the first five books of the Bible) could not have been composed, as venerable tradition would have it, by Moses or, for that matter, by any one individual, but must have been written and redacted (combined) by a number of authors and editors, in different times and places. This “Documentary Hypothesis,” as their discovery came to be called, is one of the great and enduring achievements of modern philology, and it laid the foundation for the modern study of the Bible. In this course, we will take the analysis of the Pentateuch into its underlying sources as our starting point, and carefully read our way through it, from the giving of the Law at Mount Sinai to Moses’ farewell speech at the border of the Promised Land. If our basic approach is literary, we will not simply read it through as we would, say, a modern novel. Rather, we will interpret the underlying sources individually and then consider the meaning of their subsequent redaction. In addition to tracing the Pentateuch’s narrative arc, we will also devote a substantial part of the semester to studying biblical law in relation to the legal conventions of the ancient Near East. What we will ultimately find is that philological analysis, far from detracting from the Bible’s meaning, actually helps restore it, by stripping away some of the accumulated obscurities that have come to distort readers’ perceptions of this ancient text. Numerous secondary readings will, furthermore, expose students to modern approaches to and interpretations of this foundational book or, rather, collection of composite books.
